This study explored the development of newborn reflexes in response to a novel object and their relationship to maternal morphine addiction. Forty-eight pregnant women participated in this study, 12 women of whom used opioids during pregnancy and the remaining 36 women used drugs other than opioids. Following delivery, newborns were placed on their mother's abdomen for 30 minutes and their behavior toward the object was observed and recorded. The duration of orientation, the time spent on orientation, the amount of head and trunk movement, and the total duration of motor activity were recorded. These behaviors were more frequent and of longer duration in the morphine-using group. The morphine-using group also showed a more active (p=0.006) and alert (p=0.004) motor pattern. There were no differences between the groups in the time of return to mother's arms or her head position. In conclusion, newborns respond more actively in the presence of a novel object in the morphine-using group and their motor activity is more alert. These findings suggest that the newborns of opioid-using mothers are more attentive and responsive to the environment.Q: Jquery AJAX function is not loading correctly I have this function: function get_site_posts() { $.ajax({ type: "GET", url: " 82157476af
